

Road Test Pilot

MY FUN PLACE

Honest Reviews and Opinions

For fun and my own amusement I started a YouTube channel. I had no idea what I wanted to put on it but knew that I liked photography, art and my motorcycle.

I've enjoyed learning about video production and hopefully have created a small amount of useful and/or entertaining content. There's been an incredible amount of poor quality stuff too (I've created), but this, is the journey to getting better.

Having your own channel focusses your mind on what you're passionate about. It's often cited that you have to focus on ONE thing on your YouTube channel. I've lost sight of this as I add more content that is about things that fascinate me. But, that's not to say, I can't, at a later date, divide the content into other channels to keep the focus on each idea alone.

Who knows? Personally I get bored with peoples content when it is just one thing they keep doing. But I suppose it's easier to turn people off if you're flitting between subjects that a subscriber is just not expecting from you nor interested in!

LINKS

www.roadtestpilot.com

www.youtube.com/@roadtestpilot

ONLY FANS

Along with the other social media's you really must check out my Only Fans site.

<https://onlyfans.wtf/roadpilot> 😊

Having a YouTube channel leads you to think about other social media platforms, from Facebook to Instagram and TickTock (or OnlyFans 😊) etc. There's also some lesser known platforms such as Vimeo, Odysee and Rumble etc. Some of these are easier to post links on and have a more 'open' platform. I expect to add content to these platforms soon.

<100 Subscribers?

Even with less than 100 subscribers I was surprised to learn my posts were regularly exceeding 500 views. I'm not doing anything special to achieve such relatively high results. It's just that platforms such as YouTube, Instagram and Facebook will push your content out to what it considers are your target audience. Depending on the performance of your video will either push it out more, or let it slide into oblivion. It's worth noting Reels and Shorts only have a lifespan of 24hrs anyway.

Don't think it's not worth starting a channel. You may not have many subscribers but a few people will view and comment on your posts. Moreover, you can't put a value on people you may have been helpful to or entertained with your content...

A REWARDING EXPERIENCE

I had an issue with my motorcycle.

I'm travelling along the road and glance down at my speedometer. It's showing I'm doing zero mph. I also noticed that the indicators were not cancelling after I put them on to signal a turn.

Very frustrating and an intermittent problem. In certain gears it would seem to fire back to life and actually show me what ridiculous speeds I was doing. But, the problem became progressively worse. After some online research I located the problem. It was the "speed sensor".

So, I made a YouTube video about the issue. Not long afterwards some very kind comments followed as other riders had experienced the self same issue and thanking me for my video whereby I'd pointed out where the speed sensor is located and offer advice on what could be a simple fix.

This was a most rewarding experience, that feeling of being helpful and useful to someone.

See the video I'm talking about here.

KEEP GOING

It's apparent to me that your videos do not have to be that polished. They can as, some of mine, provide useful information alone to be of value. I know this deep down from my own internet searches, YouTube is a valuable search engine of useful information, that is if you don't get sidetracked by entertaining SHORTS

CONTACT

andrew@roadtestpilot.com